A Note on Music Genres

745 Words • 2 Pages

Over the past century music change has been based on the influence of people and technology. The changes in technology have influenced the way music is listened to and the instruments in that time period that make the sounds. The sound of the music links directly to the likes and dislikes, which brings us to the influence of the people. Every aspect of a person has an effect. You must take into account what they are feeling and what their lifestyle is. Then the next step is to look at the influence on their lifestyle. Society, it is the people's likes, dislikes, cultures, and politics as a whole. It can be gathered that what society is doing, everyone is doing it too. So, when it comes to popular music the big question is. what is society listening

For a better description of popular music, according to the Oxford English Dictionary Online, popular is “prevalent or current among the general public.” Popular music is the genre that is on the radio, playing in people’s cars, and at their homes. It is the feel good sound that brings everyone together to dance, play, and sing. However, it is ever changing and with that begins a timeline, to understand the growth of music.

To make a popular genre there has to be the basic sounds that lead to it all. As David Robertson has said, “When a composer imagines a sound and then notates it for someone else there are lots of common beliefs in play. The pitch will probably be standard: it will relate to existing instruments and therefore to habits of tone production and listening that have been established for quite a while.” So, this timeline begins in the 1900’s.

From 1900 to 1910 the popular genres were country blues, ragtime, and anglo-american folk. The blues and ragtime were imme...

Robertson's essay is about the change of perspective on classical music. He had got the idea for it during a celebration dinner while talking about a book that spoke of limits. This brought him to the conclusion that according to the book classical music could no longer be made how people would enjoy it. So his essay talks about the ideas that classical music is no longer popular.

After many of World War II's harmful effects, the 1950s served as a period of time of musical change that reflected the dynamic of society as well as the traditional norms and values. Many factors contributed to this transformation. For example, the civil rights movement heightened many racial tensions, and the music produced consequently manifested this tension in itself. Rock-n-roll and R&B music universalized music typically associated with African-Americans, and many African-American musicians gained fame; however, as with any relatively-widespread success, there were many musicians as well who missed their opportunities due to the same racial segregation. Personal Essay: The Genre Of 80s-90s R & B

For this essay I decided to use the genre of 80s-90s r&b. I chose this genre because I grew up around that type of music as a little kid. My mother would always play her favorite artists during car rides, cleaning days, or even on a casual morning. I think having some type of musical background, or even being introduced to music at a young age is a benefit of life. When I was younger, music was always a big part of my life. Whether I was at my grandmother's house for the weekend, at home on a normal day, music was always
