Recommended: How Music Influences Behavior

Music is a seemingly universal art form that penetrates essentially all forms of pop culture while still existing as self-contained form of entertainment. Because of the massive cultural importance of music, many individuals define themselves by their musical interests. This raises a question: do people's musical likes and dislikes define them? Many studies have been done regarding music and correlation with personality or behaviours, especially for "harder" genres (punk, metal, etc.). However, there is not a significant amount of data to confirm existing stereotypes regarding the aggression, health, or morality of listeners of Youth, in particular, gravitate to some of the most striking subculture. Youth who identify with similar subcultures often share similar traits, however, traits shared within a subculture do not necessarily have to be positive or negative. For example, a 2009 Swedish study demonstrated that youth who identify with subcultures that emphasise extreme appearances are more likely to be anxious, shy, or “socially inhibited” than youth who belong to more traditional social groups (Bešić and Kerr, 118). Three major extreme subcultures were examined within the Swedish study: punks, goths and synths. All three are musically influenced, punk and goth subcultures are somewhat universally recognized, with the remaining subculture defined within the study: “synths are named for their interest in electronically synthesized music, and they are recognized by severe, all-black clothing and dyed-black hair” (Bešić and Kerr, 116). Although youth within a subculture may share similar traits, it is important to note that in spite of the significant link between music and subculture, there are important distinctions between the two. Although there is an interesting relationship between hardcore subcultures and associated youth, the correlation between musical interest and personality or behaviour is less

Music Censorship

Healthy debates have been caused by today's music. Generally, foul language has rapidly increased within modern popular song lyrics, especially among rap and heavy metal artists' songs. An increase in explicit violence and misogyny in popular music lyrics has been recorded. These lyrics have been judged to be inspirations for violent, suicidal, and criminal acts. For example, Mr. Raymond Kuntz referred to his son's incident. "When his wife went to wake their son for school, they found him dead of a gunshot wound, still wearing his headphones with Marilyn Manson's Anti-Christ Superstar CD still in the player. The boy's favorite song was "The Reflecting God (Nina Crowley, "Senate Hearings on Music, Newsgroup at page 2, November 15, 1997)." However, the artists and producers defend the musical lyrics, and claim that these acts come purely from self-inspiration, not extrinsic influence such as their music. If this were true, then why would 59 % of substance abusers name heavy metal as their favorite type of music? (Javier Martin, "Separating Fact from Fiction: Rock of the artists. Therefore, if an artist sets an example of being "cool" and performing harmful acts, a listener may reproduce his learned actions. "Rappers call on their fans to kill, dismember, and smash the heads of teachers, and dumb cops (Peter Viles, "Bulgaria's racist rap." World Press Review June 1996: Page 41)." The entire world is affected by this reoccurring theme, since adolescents are influenced by music on a daily basis. Although almost everyone is directly affected, some people do not admit to profane music having a personal influence. "People perceive media content to have greater impact on others than on themselves." (Douglas M. McLeod, "Support for Censorship of Violent and Misogynic Rap Lyrics." Communication Research, April 1997: page 153). Naturally, the majority of youth is heavily influenced
